Re: CPH

Editor:
If Cal Poly wants to build huge buildings, then it can build a state-of-the-art fire station, complete with the expensive state-of-the-art firefighting equipment (Cartoon, Feb. 2).
Sue Hart, Eureka

Editor:
California is lost in its housing problem, but there are solutions. The current dilemma facing CPH students is embedded in that quagmire. The VA successfully ended veteran homelessness by creating homes, at least in some regions. I think there is a lesson there about power and political will.
There are many efforts here in Humboldt working to address our housing crisis, and I want to recognize them. The purpose of this letter is to urge the university, the city of Arcata and everyone in Humboldt to be part of a future-focused solution.

Maybe we can't do what the VA did, but for Humboldt, there are solutions. We could increase housing stock by creating student housing co-ops, launching senior-student programs where one generation cares for another in exchange for a room, securing land trusts to make housing more accessible, experimenting with tiny house neighborhoods, even convincing Silicon Valley to experiment with 3-D built affordable homes. We could run citizens assemblies like they did in Petaluma to guide the process so the community is invested and all voices are heard. There are difficult barriers in doing any of these actions — but they can be overcome.

If these ideas seem futuristic, they're only so in scale. Each one is happening now, peppered across the country in small ways that could grow, and I urge the administration and the city governments to consider sowing these promising seeds. It's not idealistic; it's about political will.
Our students are dealing with a cavalcade of climate change anxiety, and by some miracle of the human condition still display hope. Seeing that is the most humbling aspect of my job. We ought to look deeply into the troubles that will unfold in our and our students' lifetimes, and center housing innovation. We need to think and act as futurists.

Benjamin Graham, Arcata

Editor:
Throughout the growing pains of changing its name, and mission as a California Poly technical institution, there have been several moments that bring alarm to the greater Arcata community. This includes the purchase of the Creekside property on Foster Avenue in July of 2022, as well as

The Ornithologist

Fed by a series of winter storms, the local park's seasonal pond has made its annual reappearance and now dozens of ducks, alerted by their innate pond-recognition software, have descended to take up residence.

I pause on my daily walk to observe them going about their ducky business, gliding and head-dunking and quacking in entertainingly Disneyesque fashion.

"Not enough meat on them yet!" shouts a neighbor as he cycles past, and we exchange the brief back-and-forth that can help a community cohere, no matter the outcome of the last election, but as he disappears uphill, I drift back into my solitary avian-regarding reverie.

I can scarcely tell a seagull from a swan, so I certainly have no idea whether sudden outbursts of wing-flap squalling and outrage are triggered by disagreements over food, habitat, or marital infidelity, but I'm perfectly happy to watch the show.

In a few weeks, if past years are any guide, there will be fluffy flotillas of cartoon-cute ducklings frantically trying to follow their imperious mothers, and I will be a pondside onlooker, oddly but unquestionably soothed by the scene, at least momentarily able to accept what is, without having to ask why.

recent events. The Creekside purchase was the first demonstration that development would come at the cost of housing security, in the form of our elderly.

The actions by Cal Poly to announce the removal of hundreds of students from campus, who have already committed to four years of living in Arcata, is unacceptable. Cal Poly promised them, via a social contract, that in exchange for financial payment, they would be secure in their basic needs of shelter, food and stability, while obtaining a higher education. To bring forth a solution that has not gone through a public process, in the form of a floating barge, or other suggestions still developing, is moving in the direction of unconstitutional.

More concerning is the lack of transparency from Cal Poly. To date, Cal Poly has not met with the city of Arcata Planning Commission to discuss its development plans, despite several public calls from the commission. It did not disclose plans to purchase the Creekside property to the city, which was engaged with the public process to develop the property for senior housing. Not communicating the plans to purchase the Creekside property could be considered a faux pas, but to repeat the process again, with its new "solution," should be considered repeated behavior and a conscious decision to abdicate responsibility to follow public process, pitting our community at odds with the state.

Students! California Polytechnic has new offerings. In the Electronics department you can major in Radio Station Maintenance. KHSU will be your shining example (dead silence or nothing but static for about two weeks recently). Over in the Building Arts Department you can study How to Build Tall Buildings without Fire Protection. The Language Arts Department will offer a companion course in How to 'Diss the Local Fire Department. And in a joint venture between the Business and Finance departments and the University Administration Studies Department, learn How to Drastically Increase Enrollment Before You Build Student Housing.

But wait, there's more! The clincher is an honor's course in How to Evict Current On-Campus Students. If you complete all these classes and develop the requisite sense of power over and disdain for both students and the surrounding community, you will have a bright future in University Administration. What's not to like?

Alumni! CPH obviously has the community's and students' best interests at heart, so donate heavily to your Alumni Association. They need your money.

Whither that Foam?

Editor:

Reading Mike Kelly's Foam Club in the Feb. 23 issue of the NCJ brought back memories of my days in graduate school at the University of Minnesota in the 1970s.

The Minneapolis campus is divided into two parts by the Mississippi River with a pedestrian bridge connecting them. Springtime annually, what appeared to be soap suds would float by under the bridge. This would lead people to speculate that there must have been an industrial leak upstream.

Invariably, there would then be an article in the university newspaper explaining that the foam was actually due to natural organic matter that had been agitated as it was swept into the river by snow melt. This process is analogous to the formation of sea foam by the surf as Kelly explained in his article.

‘Important and Relevant’

Editor:

On behalf of its steering committee, I write to say the Humboldt Asians and Pacific Islanders in Solidarity (HAPI) commends the North Coast Journal for publishing Alex Service’s important and relevant story of our local history (“Between Prejudice and Profit: The post-expulsion saga of the Chinese workers at the Eel River Cannery,” Feb. 16).

Many in our community are not aware of the history of Chinese immigrants and their contributions in Humboldt. Even though our community has made considerable progress since the expulsions of Chinese immigrants over 100 years ago, there’s still much work to be done to address racism and prejudice. For example, the Jardin Santuario (Sanctuary Garden for the local immigrant community) in Arcata continues to be vandalized with racist messages. Acknowledging and learning from our history is not about shaming, but about repairing relations to build a more equitable community.

‘Let’s Not Freak Out’

Editor:

Drag is not synonymous with trans (Mailbox, March 2). Drag is also not synonymous with burlesque or nudity (on the contrary, drag typically involves elaborate outfits/costumes). I didn’t know much about the history of drag, but there’s this thing called the Internet and, though containing a lot of misinformation, it’s not hard to find credible info. Willful ignorance is no excuse for spouting hate. Maybe start with the 2022 PBS Newshour article titled, “Political rhetoric, false claims obscure the history of drag performance.”

There are plenty of real threats, from gun violence to climate change to poverty. Let’s not freak out over events meant to foster inclusion and respect for diversity. Racism, misogyny, transphobia and other forms of bigotry are learned. They can be unlearned. That goes for everyone, whether a resident of Ferndale or, say, Humboldt County’s First District supervisor.

COAST CENTRAL CREDIT UNION

Why We Give Back

FOR A STRONGER ECONOMY

“We were unsure if the purchase would go through, but Coast Central gave us a loan for the commercial property, put our mind at ease, and set us on our way to success!”

“It was pre-COVID over pizza lessons in our kitchen with Tom Pagano, Tomaso’s previous owner, that we started talking about him retiring and us looking for a new adventure. I’m a partner in my family’s business, Nilsen Feed, and Amy worked for the County of Humboldt at that time, and we had met at Eureka High.

Before we knew it, our negotiations to buy the business were impacted by COVID. We were unsure if the three-decades-old business would even have to close. Mandy at Coast Central jumped in to help us get a loan for the property and set us on our way to success! That was our first introduction to CCCU, and since then, the teams at Harrison and Giuntoli have shown us how much they care about us. With two busy teenagers at home, the kind and positive experience they give us every time is really appreciated!”

A 'Robust' Conversation

Eureka town hall focuses on challenges in mental health services

By Thadeus Greenson

thad@northcoastjournal.com

Over the course of nearly three hours on March 4, as a panel of county and city officials discussed mental health services, a number of themes emerged: Humboldt County is brimming with trauma but has limited resources to address it amid a legal framework that gives all but the very sickest among us power over their own mental health care decisions.

These themes were apparent almost from the start of the first-of-its kind town-hall-style meeting hosted in Eureka City Council Chambers, when Mayor Kim Bergel read a submitted question asking panelists whether they believe the establishment of a mental health court would help.

Public Defender Luke Brownfield, who moments earlier had noted that the majority of the clients his office defends in criminal cases suffer from mental health issues, said it would, and it's something his office has been working toward. As implemented elsewhere, a mental health court would essentially oversee a diversion program that gives mentally ill defendants the option of enrolling in treatment programs instead of incarceration.

"We've seen it work," Brownfield said of such diversion agreements, adding that the current impediment to implementing a full-scale mental health court is there aren't enough providers locally to treat everyone who would qualify. "There just aren't enough services available for the amount of people who would be able to utilize them. The court is a little bit hesitant because we just don't have enough providers to give people the help they need."

But Brownfield made clear he believes such a court is in Humboldt County's future: "Eventually, it's coming."

County Department of Health and Human Services program manager Mark Lamers said part of why these programs have proven effective is they provide "some leverage" to get people into care who might otherwise decline it. Pointing out that mental health treatment is voluntary in California up until certain criteria is met — specifically until a person is deemed an imminent risk to the safety of themselves or others, or found incapable of keeping themselves safe and providing for their most basic needs — Lamers said mental health courts can sometimes bridge the gap between what someone wants and what they need.

The court, he said, can ask, "Would you rather access services or would you rather spend time in jail or prison? It encourages folks to see the benefit of accessing treatment voluntarily."

And that can be hugely important, as Lamers later noted that a majority of people with severe mental illness suffer from the symptom anosognosia, also called a "lack of insight" to the presence of their illness.

"One of the first things that often goes when people have significant mental illness is the ability to recognize they're no longer coloring within the lines, that they're no longer doing what everyone else does, that their basic behavior has become disorganized and even frightening to other people," he said. "With that comes a lack of understanding that medications can help. People with mental health issues often feel normal."

Conversely, Lamers said they also feel side effects of the medications they are taking while often not recognizing the benefits. This can result in patterns that see someone placed under an emergency 72-hour hold in a psychiatric hospital stabilize when medicated, only to see their condition decline when they are released and "taking medication once again becomes voluntary."

While the panel took questions and input from a wide variety of community members — almost all of whom said they have personally experienced mental illness or have a loved one who has, or work in mental health care services — the subject of emergency holds and hospitalizations came up repeatedly.

Such involuntarily emergency hospitalizations — known as 5150 holds — can be initiated when it is determined a person is an immediate risk to themselves or others, and allow someone to be held against their will for up to 72 hours until they are evaluated by a mental health clinician.

Eureka Police Department Cmdr. Leonard La France, who oversees the department's Community Safety Enforcement Team, which responds to about 40 percent of the 1,100 or so mental-health-related police calls in the city annually, said the department has been working to divert as many people away from such hospitalizations as possible. Sempervirens, the county's only psychiatric health hospital, only has 16 beds, La France said, and when it is full, folks who meet the 5150 designation have to be held in the emergency room at St. Joseph Hospital until a bed opens up. Last week, La France said, 12 of the hospital's 26 ER beds were taken up with people on psychiatric holds, which places a burden on the hospital and does little to treat the needs of the patients.

Throughout the evening, panelists mentioned some promising developments coming online to deliver additional services. Lamers said a new residential treatment facility will be opening this fall for "youth in crisis," and La France said a "navigation center," or a place outreach workers can bring homeless people to connect them with other services, will be opening in the next 18 months.

Resources and staffing, however, remain huge limiting factors.

A man who identified himself as a successful carpenter addressed the panel and said he has had trouble finding mental health treatment locally, saying both psychiatrists and therapists are in very short supply. Lamers confirmed this is the case, saying he knows people who have spent years looking for a psychiatrist.

"There's a chronic shortage of providers at every level in the state of California — it's not just Humboldt," he said. "Do I have an answer for that? I don't."

That shortage also extends to case managers and social workers, with local psychiatrist Katy Wilson telling the panel she was told DHHS has one case manager per 700 patients in its adult outpatient mental health clinic.

Lamers said case managers offer the return on investment in the system, saying, "If we spent the same amount on case managers as we spend for higher level services, we'd need a lot less higher-level services."

Brownfield said his office received funding to hire a social worker a couple of years ago and that's been hugely impactful, helping clients address their basic needs, whether it be treatment, employment or housing. But it's one position in an office that has hundreds of clients at any given time and it's simply not enough. Ideally, he said, the county would have social workers available to meet people being released from the jail "on the street as soon as they get out," to tell them what they need to do, where they need to go and connect them with services.

A recurring theme of the evening — brought up repeatedly in response to the overlapping issues of mental illness, homelessness and substance use — was trauma.

"Trauma, if you peel back the onion, is really the core for this," La France said.

Later in the meeting, Lamers noted the scientific link between experiencing childhood trauma and "all kinds of series down-stream outcomes," including incarceration, poor health and drug use. This is of particular note in Humboldt County, he said, where the trauma of "multi-generational genocides" and "multi-generational outlaw communities" are prevalent.

"These things have multi-generational outcomes that require healing," he said.

Having already gone well over its allotted time, the meeting ended with most of the questions submitted in advance or by people watching remotely left unasked and unanswered, underscoring the degree to which local residents feel mental health service delivery is a critical issue. Bringing the meeting to a close, Bergel thanked everyone for participating.

"It's an important and robust conversation and I hope we can continue to move forward together to make positive solutions," the mayor said. "Every person in our community — every person — has value. Everyone. ... A health community lifts each other up."

Fortuna Police Warn of Skimming Scam, Seek Public’s Help Cracking Case

By Thadeus Greenson
thad@northcoastjournal.com

Fortuna police are warning of a potential skimming scam aimed at accessing credit and debit card information. They are also seeking help identifying a suspect in the case.

The case’s roots stretch back to October of 2021, according to Lt. Matt Eberhardt, when the department got a cluster of debit or credit card fraud reports from people who said their last legitimate transaction had been at a gas station in the 3600 block of Rohnerville Road. An initial investigation ruled out employees of the business and found that someone had installed a skimming device — or a digital device used to mine customers’ credit or debit information from an electric card reader — on one of the pumps.

Over the ensuing 17 months, Fortuna police detectives have discovered the installation of three additional such skimming devices and tried covert operations — “everything from personnel to technology,” Eberhardt says — but have been unable to identify suspects in the case or determine a pattern to their behavior.

“It seems random,” says detective Ryan Richardson, who has been working the case.

With only a couple of fuzzy surveillance photos of a possible suspect and associated vehicles, no obvious pattern and proactive enforcement efforts having come up empty, Eberhardt says the department decided to make the public aware of the case hoping it leads to a break. “We figure it’s time to put it out to the public, see if someone recognizes these individuals.”

When the department discovered the first installation of a card skimmer, Richardson took the information to a regular meeting he has with other investigators from law enforcement agencies throughout Humboldt County to see if any of them had encountered similar cases.

Eureka had encountered an isolated case some years back, he said, but no one else had run into anything similar.

"At the time, no other agencies were seeing this or receiving reports of it," Richardson said.

Elsewhere, though, such cases are fairly widespread, according to news accounts. Most commonly, thieves purchase protruding magnetic card readers that slide over the readers at gas pumps. They then install them when no one is looking, and the readers then record the card information of anyone who uses a card to pay at that pump. Such scams have become a real problem in some urban areas, and Richardson said the thieves will then either sell the stolen credit and debit card data on the "dark web" or will purchase machines that allow them to make duplicate cards at home.

The Fortuna cases appear a bit atypical — and more sophisticated — though, as the thieves in this case installed the skimming apparatus inside the pump itself, so there would be no way to know anything was suspicious looking at the outside of the pump, whereas a trained eye can spot the skimmers installed externally. At first, Richardson said a key question the investigation had to answer was how the suspects had gained access to the internal workings of the pumps.

The answer did not narrow down the suspect pool as detectives may have hoped, though, as Richardson said he found that the pump manufacturer simply makes one master key per year, meaning that all pumps manufactured in the same year accommodate the same key.

While it's unknown how long the first skimming device police found in Fortuna was in place and just how many credit and debit accounts it may have compromised — Eberhardt said he suspects it may have been a "significant" amount of time — Eberhardt and Richardson said the other three were discovered fairly quickly, as the station has implemented a regular inspection schedule to look for them.

Nonetheless, Eberhardt and Richardson expect the scheme has impacted far more people than have come forward to report their accounts being compromised. Generally, they said, one someone sees fraudulent charges they report them directly to their financial institutions, which simply write them off unless the amounts pass a certain dollar threshold that requires a police report.

Richardson said the department has been working with the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Weights and Measures Division, which has jurisdiction over gas pumps, but the agency hasn't been able to bring many investigative resources to the table.

Moving forward, in addition to solving the immediate case, they say they also want to make the public more aware of skimming efforts, which are reportedly on the rise.

"It's a growing trend, it really is," says Eberhardt.

To protect themselves, Richardson recommends people use chip cards, paying with the swipe technology where possible, saying skimmers have yet to become technologically advanced enough to read these. Alternatively, he suggests just paying in cash. And when it comes to gas stations, they suggest visually inspecting the pumps to see if there's anything suspicious — pry marks, broken seals, anything unusual about the card reader — before paying. And they urge businesses to invest in modernizing their equipment and to report any illicit activity they find to their local law enforcement agency.

If anyone recognizes any of the suspect photos or has information about the case, they ask them to call Richardson at (707) 725-1436. Or if they need to contact someone urgently, they can try the main line at (707) 725-2550. ●

Operation Bales Away

On Saturday, March 4, Humboldt County Sheriff William Honsal got an atypical call. It was from Second District Supervisor Michelle Bushnell, who'd been fielding frantic calls from cattle ranchers in her district who had been blocked off from tending their herds by roads covered in heavy snow and downed trees, leaving their cows unfed and unable to graze on the snow-covered ranches.

One of them, she said, noted that when this happened some 35 years ago, back in 1989, a U.S. Coast Guard helicopter was enlisted to air-drop bales of hay to the starving herds.

"Is this something that can actually be done," Honsal recalled Bushnell asking. "I said, 'I have no idea, but I'll ask.'"

Honsal said he immediately reached out to the Coast Guard and CalFire to see what was possible and received a similar response from local commanders: They didn't know if policy allowed them to help, but they would if they could.

The sheriff said his department then made some official "agency assist requests" and petitioned the California Office of Emergency Services, pleading that these herds hadn't been able to eat in 10 days and were starving, with many of the cows calving.

"It has become a dire situation," he said. "These ranchers are in danger of losing a significant part of their stock."

With the various agency approvals in hand, Operation Bales Away started as a test effort March 5 from the Rohnerville Airport, where hay from 3B Farms was loaded by hand onto the CalFire and Coast Guard choppers, which would then use GPS coordinates to drop the bales into snow-covered fields to be gobbled up by hungry cattle.

3B Farms owner Erik Bess said Bushnell and Jack Rice from the Humboldt Del Norte Cattlemen's Association were instrumental in coordinating the effort, which ultimately saw five runs each made to seven different ranches. Honsal said he realized the effort would have to continue into the week and additional resources were needed.

"The time and distance to these ranches, and the amount of hay some of them need, is pretty great," he said, adding that he'd put in an additional request for a larger helicopter from the California National Guard, a request that was granted March 7.

While the Coast Guard helicopter was ultimately deemed an awkward fit for hay deliveries, Honsal said the agency will continue to assist the effort, acting as scout. While the drop teams have GPS coordinates for the ranches, many of them sprawl over many acres of steep terrain, making finding the herds, which are often taking shelter under the trees difficult. Moving forward, Honsal said the Coast Guard helicopter will work to spot cattle tracks to better pinpoint the hay drops.

"They're not currently dropping hay but offering logistical support and spotting," Honsal said of the Coast Guard crew.

The agency seemed to be having a bit of fun with its atypical assignment, rhetorically asking on social media how much hay you can fit in the back of an MH-65 helicopter. (About 500 pounds, if you were curious, per the post, which included the hashtags #specialdelivery and #SoOthersMayMoo.)

The post drew an outpouring of gratitude and praise on social media.

"Thank you for your sacrifice," write Autumn Kruse, "because you're never getting that hay out of your seats."

Saving the Sea Otter

Feds find reintroduction into Northern California possible but more research needed

By Kimberly Wear

kim@northcoastjournal.com

On rare occasions, a sea otter makes an appearance on the North Coast.

Locally extinct since around the turn of the 20th century, the last confirmed sighting was in 2015, when one was filmed frolicking in Humboldt Bay. In less fortunate cases, remains of two sea otters were separately discovered washed up on area beaches over the last decade. Genetic testing showed one was part of the northern population that extends from Washington state to Alaska, while the other was the southern subspecies that lives along the Central California coast, between Santa Barbara and San Mateo counties.

How and why the furry sea creatures with animated faces that have launched a thousand memes found their way to Humboldt — as well as the origin and outcome of the sea otter seen alive and swimming near the North Jetty — is unknown because none had tracking devices.

Although male sea otters are sometimes prone to wander long distances, getting here would have meant traveling several hundred miles, while evading their ocean nemeses — the great white shark and orca — and finding enough places to forage along the way.

There is, however, a glimmer of possibility that North America's smallest marine mammal could return to the region — not just as wayward visitors but permanent residents, opening a new chapter for the threatened species. Otters' reintroduction would also bring the potential added benefit of helping restore the North Coast's beleaguered bull kelp ecosystem by bringing back a keystone predator missing for generations.

The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service is currently weighing whether to transplant sea otters to select sites in portions of their former territory — from the Bay Area to Oregon — in an attempt to aid their recovery and eventually bridge the more than century-long separation between southern sea otters and their northern counterparts.

"Reintroducing sea otters to Northern California and Oregon would help increase genetic diversity and long-term sustainability of sea otters in the wild by beginning to reconnect the northern sea otter and southern sea otter subspecies," Lilian Carswell, USFWS's southern sea otter recovery and marine conservation coordinator, said in an email to the Journal. "Scientists have identified that Northern California and Oregon have suitable habitat to support sea otters, and this area constitutes the largest remaining gap in the formerly continuous historical range of the sea otter."

The agency released a report over the summer that found reintroduction is biologically, socioeconomically and legally feasible but the 200-page assessment came with the caveat that far more research needs to be done to narrow down potential landing spots, as well as additional public outreach and studies on possible socioeconomic impacts.

Sea otters' current and historical range.
Z. Cravens/USFWS

USFWS did not take a position on whether to proceed.

"In the assessment, we determined that reintroducing sea otters to parts of their former range could help restore nearshore ecosystems, increase gene flow between sea otter populations, benefit the threatened southern sea otter and provide overall economic gains to coastal communities," Carswell said. "As we go forward, we'll be working with scientists and a broad range of stakeholders to make sure any actions we're considering are fully vetted and that we're taking into account input from everyone who might be affected."

Earlier this year, the Center for Biological Diversity filed a formal petition asking USFWS to immediately start the process over "a large stretch of the West Coast," noting in a statement that the effort is integral to protecting the southern sea otter by enhancing the subspecies' ability "to intermingle, enhancing genetic diversity and helping them adapt to changing environmental conditions." Geographically diversifying the population would also provide a buffer to risks from catastrophic localized events, like an oil spill.

"Bringing the sea otter back to the broader West Coast would be an unparalleled conservation success story," Kristin Carden, a former senior scientist with the center who authored the petition, said in the statement. "Not only would the sea otters thrive, but they would also help restore vital kelp forest and seagrass ecosystems."

Once believed to have numbered into the hundreds of thousands across a vast Pacific Ocean expanse from northern Japan to Baja California — including the coastal waters of Humboldt, Del Norte, and Mendocino counties — sea otters were hunted to the brink of extinction during the 1700s and 1800s by a maritime fur trade that coveted their luxuriant pelts, which are the thickest of any mammal.

By the time a 1911 international treaty made killing sea otters illegal, only a few hundred remained in small, isolated pockets, mostly around Alaska. In California, sea otters were considered lost until 1938, when approximately 50 were discovered to have found a haven in a remote section of the Big Sur coastline.

Over the ensuing years, extensive conservation efforts have seen that remnant colony — the forebearers of the entire current southern sea otter population — grow to some 3,000 otters.

Monterey Bay Aquarium has been at the forefront of that work for decades, with its sea otter research and work in rescuing, rehabilitating and releasing the animals contributing to the USFW feasibility assessment report on a number of levels, according to Aimee David, vice president for U.S. and California ocean conservation at the aquarium.

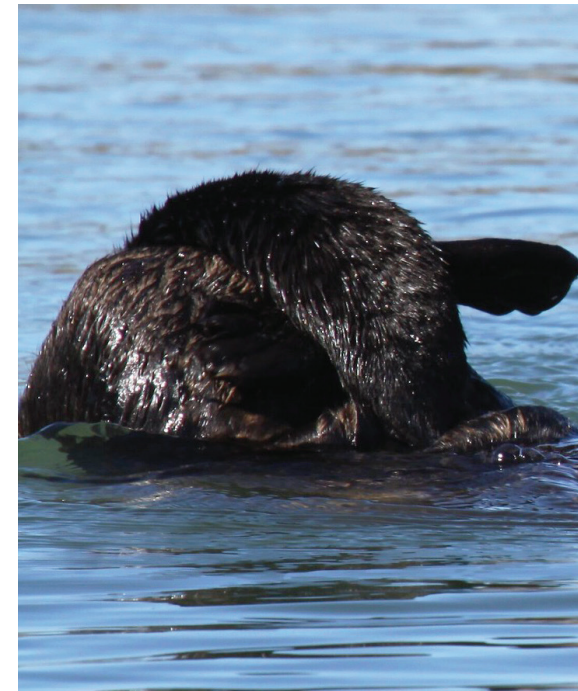

“So, we have an interest in recovering southern sea otters,” David said. “We have also done a lot of work in researching the relationship between southern sea otters and their ecosystems, and have seen this work in practice play out, where we see the essential role sea otters play in the healthy kelp forests, in the healthy seagrass meadows, and we have seen those benefits increase with the presence of otters.”

She also notes the sea otters’ status as an economic driver on the Central Coast, bringing in tourists hoping to capture a glimpse of the “iconic species” swimming in local bays or lounging in the kelp beds wrapped with seaweed tendrils to avoid floating away while they rest, sometimes while holding paws.

One “promising method of reintroduction” developed at the aquarium over the last 20 years has adult females in the sea otter exhibit act as surrogate moms for stranded pups. They’re able to pass on important life skills, like how to groom and search for food, which allows most of the young to be released back to the wild, David said, with a high success rate of the animals staying and thriving in new environments.

In previous attempts, like a relocation effort at San Nicolas Island off the coast of Santa Barbara in the late 1980s, up to 90 percent of the animals initially placed in a new location were lost, both from dispersal — attempts to return to where they came from — and death, the USFW report states.

But because the young rehabilitated sea

otters don’t have ties to a particular territory, those released from the aquarium to an estuary near Monterey Bay in recent years have shown an ability to adapt well to new places. Along with other lessons learned from previous reintroduction efforts — including some success keeping sea otters in pens at new release sites for a period of time — incorporating surrogate-raised pups into the mix shows potential for mitigating the dispersal issue. But, the assessment states, “This approach has never been tested as a method of establishing a new population in an area that is entirely unoccupied.”

Potential losses are inherent in any attempt, the assessment notes, but not moving forward comes with its own risks.

“As long as the bulk of the southern sea otter subspecies remains concentrated in one isolated stretch of coast, it is vulnerable to catastrophic events, such as a large oil spill, that could effectively eliminate the source population,” the assessment states. “The risk of such an unforeseen event, even if extremely unlikely in any one year, poses a significant threat to the southern sea otter while waiting for the population to expand on its own. ... We therefore conclude there is a risk with inaction, and that risk is greatest for the threatened southern sea otter due to diminished adaptive capacity and a lack of redundancy in populations.”

While the southern sea otter population descends from a finite gene pool, decades of research indicate a low level of diversity is not the primary reason the subspecies isn’t recovering at higher levels, said Jess Fujii, manager of the Monterey Bay Aquarium’s Sea Otter Program.

Instead, Fujii said, disease, pollution

Southern sea otters often rest in groups called rafts. Unlike other marine mammals, sea otters do not have a blubber layer to keep warm. and deadly shark-bites have proven to be a more formative barrier, with the latter seen as one of the major reasons the southern sea otters' range has not expanded in the last 10 years. Fujii added, "Something like a reintroduction could be a way to overcome that ... by sort of getting beyond that almost physical obstacle."

Carswell agreed. Without human intervention, she said, it's "very unlikely that sea otters will recolonize the Northern California or Oregon coast within our lifetime."

As for the sightings of sea otters in Humboldt, Carswell said, "The fact that sea otters are occasionally found transiting the Northern California and Oregon coast does suggest that one or more new populations established in this gap could serve as stepping stones to reconnect the northern and southern subspecies."

In addition to aiding sea otters, reintroduction carries potential benefits for local marine habitats, with the animals — which need to consume 25 percent of their body weight in food each day — playing a key role in checking sea urchin populations in the kelp forests where they currently live.

But, like most aspects of potential relocation, there are still a number of unknowns in how that might play out along the North Coast, where a series of ecological events over the last decade wreaked havoc on the region's bull kelp forests, with huge swaths stripped bare by marauding armies of purple urchins, resulting in the collapse of the area's red abalone stock.

The USFWS assessment notes that "multiple stakeholders" have raised questions about whether a relocation attempt in the region could interfere with efforts to restore the complex ecosystem. The most troubling question is whether the sea otters would eschew the purple urchins currently existing in a near starvation state in favor of their other shellfish staples, like crab or the perilously endangered abalone. But if the otters primarily feed on the urchins, the effects could be impactful.

"If the return of sea otters to the Northern California coast resulted in the rapid recovery of kelp cover that has been documented elsewhere, it would provide a significant boost to restoration efforts for that ecosystem and the species that depend upon it, including the red abalone and red sea urchin," Carswell said.

"There is some uncertainty as to how quickly such changes might occur, however, due to some complicating factors."

Those include how quickly sea otters "might manage to exert positive influences in a kelp forest already reduced to an urchin barren." And, with suitable sea otter habitat only occurring in "a patchy mosaic along the coast," Carswell said the animals' ability to "enhance degraded kelp forest systems over a significant extent of coastline" would likely not occur anytime in the near future, even if reintroduction happened soon, due to "the slow population growth of reintroduced sea otter populations."

Ultimately, the core of any successful reintroduction effort will come down to not only finding viable sea otter habitat but an extensive exploration of potential cost and benefits to the surrounding communities.

"We really want to go into this scientifically without biases, what does the science and what does the data show could be good areas and then, as well, what would the community impact be and what are their perspectives on this, as well," Fujii said. "So, both of those combined are going to be very important."

The feasibility assessment, Carswell notes, was just a first step.

"We plan to hold listening sessions to hear what people in different areas think about sea otter reintroduction, and we will hold stakeholder engagement sessions and have formal comment periods should we put forth a reintroduction proposal," she said. "We are especially interested in hearing from communities that are actively interested in the economic and other benefits sea otter reintroduction could bring." ●

The Ritz Again

By Jennifer Fumiko Cahill
jennifer@northcoastjournal.com

The Ritz Building on Third and F streets in Eureka bears a plaque marking it — the former Ritz and Star Cigar Store — as a historic landmark. It's a local Art Moderne icon from 1946, its smooth lines carved out seven years after its architectural cousin the Eureka Theater opened up the street. But even that wasn't its original form, having already had its first life as a Victorian, complete with bay windows, built by James Simpson in 1885. Then it molted into a Woolworths Department Store in 1913 before getting the rounded and neon-lit Streamline treatment in 1947. Hell, not that long ago it was pink.

Over the decades since its 1978 restoration, the Ritz's long, stately bar has been crowded and empty as servers shuttled a fusillade of fusion: fondue and hot pot; teppanyaki and sushi; French and Thai; pizza and potstickers. That its newest incarnation, helmed by Concha Alvarado, who co-owns the restaurant with her husband José Licon, should have a menu that unfolds into a triptych of burgers and sandwiches, Mexican dishes and Italian pastas, feels like tradition. And a relief from years of dark and papered-over windows.

"We came to see it and we fell in love with the bar," says Alvarado. "And since we have a full liquor license, that's why we decided to go ahead and rent this place." Her hope is that the location — a prime Old Town spot across from the Carson Block Building — will be an improvement over Garberville, where she ran Calico's Café for six years. "Garberville just got way too slow," she says. "I just hope it's a lot busier here."

Chef Fernano Licon, Alvarado's

brother-in-law, is still getting kitchen staff up to speed on the broad-ranging menu. The homemade pasta and sauces, Mexican items and burgers "all sold well" down south, says Alvarado, but it's a lot of laborious cooking for one pair of hands. Eventually, when the Ritz has staffed up a bit, she'll start thinking about hosting entertainment.

After three months of planning the transition and no renovations required, Alvarado opened the doors Tuesday, Feb. 28, and customers waited in a queue on the sidewalk that had lately served as a street musician's stage. Inside, patrons found the stained glass accents, full bar, nachos and wings, Caesar salads, enchiladas, teriyaki mushroom and Swiss cheese burgers, and Bolognese ladled over freshly made spaghetti.

The echo of the two dining rooms' past lives is more or less invisible — whether the ghosts of Woolworths' shoppers or fondue pots are with us or not. But even with a new menu in hand, there's nostalgia in seeing your reflection in the iconic Streamline Moderne bar mirror with its etched lady perched atop a globe. Alvarado says even though the menu is essentially the same, she was fine letting go of the name Calico's and changing the business to match the neon sign over the doorway generations of patrons have passed through for one nightclub or another. Everybody knows the Ritz. ●

NCJ GET OUT

A Burrowing Owl Pops Up

By Mark Larson

getout@northcoastjournal.com

Until a year ago, I had never seen a burrowing owl (Athene cunicularia). I wasn't even aware we had this species locally — I thought they only lived in the desert. But that all changed in February of 2022 out in the dunes next to the Pacific Ocean.

Out walking on a sunny morning, my wife and I slowly wandered into the dunes covered with beach grass and driftwood looking for a burrowing owl (thanks to a tip from a local birder). Our pre-trip research revealed they winter here in the driftwood on beaches from the mouth of the Eel River to the mouth of Redwood Creek ("A rare but regular winterer" in one local birder's description). Posts on social media from the past several years revealed they'd been infrequently seen on Humboldt Bay's South Spit near Table Bluff, at the Humboldt Bay Wildlife Refuge and in the Eel River delta. In October of 2017, the Humboldt Wildlife Care Center rescued one hanging around the parking lot of a motel in Eureka and later released it in the Samoa dunes.

As their name implies, burrowing owls nest in burrows made by other animals or dig their own, so we looked for burrows in the dunes and under driftwood. Given that the Soulatluk (Wiyot language) name for burrowing owl is rrutsuwubulih, meaning "eats at night," and they hunt at dusk and dawn using night vision and acute hearing, we weren't sure we'd even see one in late morning light.

As we walked into the dunes, avoiding areas with footprints of other hikers and dogs behind, we looked for a small owl or signs of its regurgitated pellets — the indigestible parts of their prey such as bones and fur. They are opportunistic predators of insects and small mammals, like voles and mice, with males taking most of the vertebrates, typically at night. An average adult (at 7–11 inches) is slightly larger than an American robin, though the burrowing owl has developed longer legs that enable it to sprint as well as fly when hunting.

Finally, we spotted two bright eyes in a small, brown-feathered head peering at us over the top of a large driftwood log. Taking care not to disturb it, we avoided walking directly toward the owl and circled it at a distance until we could clearly see its entire body. Excited to add it to our bird "life list," we scanned it through binoculars and my telephoto lens.

Guidebooks describe the beaks of burrowing owls as dark yellow or gray, depending on the subspecies. They lack ear tufts and have a flattened facial disc. The owls have prominent white eyebrows and a white "chin" patch they expand and display during certain behaviors, such as head bobbing when agitated.

We could clearly see its wings with white spotting and its white with variable brown spotting or barring chest and abdomen, and those long, grayish legs.

Males and females are similar in size and appearance. Females tend to be heavier, but males tend to have longer wings and tails. Adult males appear lighter in color because their feathers become "sun-bleached" outside the burrow during daylight (especially in desert locations).

The specimen we discovered seemed undisturbed by our presence as it scanned the sky and looked around in all directions. As I slowly moved around taking photographs with my telephoto lens, it kept me in sight at all times. When a distant hiker with an unleashed dog walked by, the owl first stretched upright on its long legs and flew only a few feet above ground to a nearby grassy dune.

Trying to avoid further disturbing the owl, we hiked further into the dunes looking for others. Finding none, we returned in an hour or so and saw the owl again perched on the same log.

Last month, on another mild sunny day between rain and snowstorms, we returned to the same location and spotted another burrowing owl perched on that same driftwood log. Again approaching stealthily, we scanned the owl with our binoculars and telephoto lens, and wondered if it could be the bird we had seen the year before.

To our amateur bird-watching eyes, this owl looked very similar to the one we'd seen a year ago — until we spotted the large metal band on its right leg. I contacted Frank Fogarty III, wildlife professor at Cal

A burrowing owl perched in the dunes last month.

Poly Humboldt. He replied by email that if this owl was the same one we'd seen in 2022, it might have been banded on its breeding grounds to the north this past summer. Enlarging my photos to read the number at his suggestion, it looks like No. 74801. So another citizen-science report can now head to the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

We're not sharing the exact location where we've spotted this burrowing owl to protect it. In addition to natural predators, they are also killed by feral and domestic cats, and unleashed dogs. Human development of habitat and systematic removal of burrow-digging mammals that create owl homes have put the birds at further risk. Though they have a widespread range across North and South America, burrowing owls are endangered in Canada and threatened in Mexico. It is a threatened species in Colorado and Florida and listed as a California "species of special concern" (a protective legal designation assigned by the California Department of Fish and Wildlife). They are also protected under the Migratory Bird Treaty Act in Canada, the U.S. and Mexico.

Ocean and River Salmon Closures Likely in 2023

By Kenny Priest

fishing@northcoastjournal.com

If the forecasts from last Wednesday's salmon information meeting are accurate, Chinook salmon are going to be few and far between this year. It will also likely result in a complete ocean closure to Chinook fishing state-wide in an effort to protect stocks. Currently, the Pacific Fishery Management Council (PFMC) is meeting in Seattle to decide the fate of our ocean and in-river seasons. While still not finalized, an early version of the three alternatives for our ocean fisheries was released today, and all three included the words "closed." This is far from unexpected as most fishing groups and anglers are urging the PFMC to curtail any Chinook salmon fishing in 2023 in California.

The fate of both the Sacramento and Klamath Rivers will be decided in the coming days but will likely be closed to fishing for fall kings. The last such closure was in 2017, when the Klamath Management Zone (California/Oregon border to Horse Mtn.) was closed to fishing along with the Klamath River beginning Aug. 15. This year is shaping up to be a whole lot worse, with ocean fall Chinook fishing potentially closed from Southern Oregon to Mexico.

The culprit is the extremely low number of both Sacramento and Klamath fish swimming in the ocean. The forecast estimates Sacramento River fall Chinook, the predominant stock harvested in California fisheries, at 169,767 adults, one of the lowest forecasts since the current assessment method came into play in 2008.

Klamath River Chinook is forecast to be 103,793 adults, the second-lowest forecast since that body of water's assessment method started in 1997. Please see the ocean salmon webpage at wildlife.ca.gov/Fishing/Ocean/Regulations/Salmon/pre-season for a complete calendar of events and contact information regarding the Salmon Preseason Process, including other opportunities for public engagement in the season-setting process. For information on the PFMC meetings, visit pcouncil.org/managed_fishery/salmon/.

The weather ahead

The next round of precipitation will arrive Thursday afternoon according to Matthew Kidwell of Eureka's National Weather Service office. "We're looking at 1.5 to 2 inches before the rain starts to taper off on Friday afternoon," said Kidwell. "The next round of showers is forecast for Saturday where we'll see off and on rain, but it won't add up to much. A more noteworthy system will arrive on Sunday and stick around through Tuesday. This will be a fairly warm and wet system. We could see 3 to 5 inches over the course of the three days, with higher totals in the mountains. We may see some flooding in the low-lying areas, but the rivers should remain intact."

The rivers: Mad

The Mad reportedly saw a good push of fish come in late last week. River conditions are still far from ideal, and they're about to get worse. As of Tuesday, flows were right around 2,000 cubic feet per second (9.4 feet). The rain coming Thursday night will push flows up to 9,500 cfs by Friday afternoon. It's unlikely we'll see the river green prior to closing at the end of the month.

Main stem Eel

The main Eel has been high and off color since late last week and won't be fishable anytime soon. It's predicted to peak at over 108,000 cfs early Saturday morning.

Nine-year-old Ryder Gregory is all smiles after catching his limit of king salmon with Heidi Musick out of Trinidad a few years back. Low abundance of salmon in the ocean has put this year's ocean and river salmon seasons in jeopardy.

South Fork Eel

The South Fork blew out last weekend and it hasn't been close to fishable since. Another big rise is slated for Friday when flows could reach over 22,000 cfs at Miranda. Will need at least a week of dry weather before the upper reaches drop into fishable shape.

Van Duzen

The Van Duzen hasn't been fishable all week and more rain is on the way. Flows were right around 835 cfs Tuesday, but it's forecast to peak at 7,500 cfs Friday. With more rain coming next week, it won't be fishable anytime soon.

Smith

The Smith is low and clear but it's in fishable shape. As of Tuesday, flows at Jed Smith had risen to 3,200 cfs. It will be receding slowly until Friday when it's predicted to rise quickly to over 13,000 cfs. It's predicted to drop Saturday before rising again Sunday. Despite the conditions, some steelhead are being caught. Boat pressure has been light. The rise in flows should bring in some fresh fish and could bring some spawners downriver.

Bull in a China Shop
at Redwood Curtain

By Doranna Benker Gilkey

frontrow@northcoastjournal.com

Friday night at Redwood Curtain Theatre, we had our first glimpse of the fiery passion between Professor Wooley and her student Jeannette Marks as played by Natasha White and Caroline Needham in Bull in a China Shop. The lovers exited the stage in perfect synchronicity with a complete blackout. The anticipation built in the audience as we waited for the next scene to start. When the timing stretched a little too far, soft, confused murmurs whispered through the tiny theater as the small blue-white of phone screens winked on. We guessed this wasn't a planned part of the evening. Enter stage left, Tony Cogliati, house manager for the night and RCT board member, quickly followed by stage manager Catheryn Noel Veatch. They informed us we were experiencing one of the few things that could stop live theater: a power outage. The audience gamely offered to shine phone lights for the actors but Veatch rightly put everyone's safety first. After 10 minutes in the dark with the excited energy of a surprise sleepover and continuous updates from either Cogliati or Veatch, it was clear the problem wouldn't solve itself. Management called it and officially ended the production for the night. The audience complied, and everyone seemed content to figure out refunds or rainchecks at a later time. This community can be so lovely.

Sunday afternoon was my second take for Bull in a China Shop. It was a full house, and I hope everyone who wants a second chance to see it gets one. As a bonus, turns out Sunday was the "talk back" production, where the cast and crew were available to answer questions after the show.

Redwood Curtain Theater's choice of play is apropos for Women's History Month. Bull in a China Shop by Bryna Turner shows the evolution of a relationship between two intelligent, passionate, driven women. It's based on the letters two historical figures penned to each other over their lifetimes. These women loved and fought during the Suffrage Movement, the Great Depression and two world wars. Mary Woolley took the position of president of a failing women's seminary specifically to shepherd evolution of the institution. Jeannette Marks taught literature there to give women access to their own creativity and voice. They both sought to fundamentally change the world, and the place of women in it, through education. The struggle tore them apart as much as it brought them together. Their sexuality was not accepted in their time but that specific struggle was not the whole of their relationship. The whole of the relationship between the women — physical, mental, spiritual, human — is the center of the story. Turner's play shows the humanity of these historical figures.

The play is written with a contemporary slant to the dialogue, making the people and events relatable without confusing the period of the piece. It covers decades quickly, which is challenging to keep up with. Director Carol Lang uses multiple tools to mark time. She uses the projection screen with unobtrusive slides and small set changes to give clues, but the majority of the work is done with the gorgeous costumes provided by Humboldt Light Opera Co. There are many costume changes for each actor throughout the play and fashion historians will appreciate the effort put into the details for each decade. The rest of us can follow the broad strokes of change from one era to another, even if specifics are lost on us. The scenes don't change so much as transition, the character's focus blending from one to the next like watercolors, reflecting the way one's past colors one's future.

The cast gives the characters so much life, I never doubted them for a minute. White is an indomitable force of nature as Mary Woolley, the titular "Bull." Needham plays an excellent foil to Woolley with her passionate, romantic Jeannette Marks. Amelia Resendez tackles the surprisingly complex role of Pearl with aplomb, giving a sweeping range of innocence and madness. Toodie Boll charms everyone with her stodgy, indirect Dean Welsh. Sarah Traywick gave a wonderful blend of spice and nice to Felicity, friend and roommate to Marks.

Historically, queer relationships are erased by omission. Woolley and Marks are often referred to as "lifelong friends" or, at best, "partners." This play leaves no question about the nature of their relationship but also doesn't depend on it for conflict. The discrimination they faced as lesbians had a huge impact on them as individuals and a couple. But they are so much more than their struggles and this play boldly colors in previous omissions.

Beautiful Era

By Collin Yeo

music@northcoastjournal.com

I have probably mentioned here before that I like going for walks, often at odd hours to avoid other people. This isn't out of any misanthropic impulse, but to stay out of the way of traffic, which is the pedestrian's natural enemy. They aren't long walks, either, I just need a space and time where I can think without screens and distractions. Silence is golden in many ways. I'm not a diarist, I lack the desire, discipline and, perhaps most importantly, legible handwriting to ever take up the practice. So, whatever thinking I do ends up in shards elsewhere, in conversations, emails, social media posts and even in this column. Don't get the idea that it's even necessarily highbrow or politically charged stuff. One memory I have from a walk I took on the Upper East Side in New York almost 20 years ago consists of me delighting at the fact that on the sidewalk I had found, frozen and standing perfectly erect, a large dog turd that bore a passing likeness to the Chrysler Building. Camera-less, I couldn't wait to spread the news to my then-girlfriend, who shared none of my amusement whatsoever. You learn to pick your audience, I guess.

But back to diaries, this column is the closest thing I have, and it's nothing compared to the real stuff. Take the journal of French Belle Époque writer Jules Renard, a fun and lively work spanning over 20 years of the author's 46-year life. I was recently gifted a copy by a friend for my birthday, and it's full of entries that delighted me and are applicable to a wide audience. For instance, his entry from Nov. 27, 1895, reads, "Keep their interest! Keep their interest! Art is no excuse for boring people." Amen to that, Jules. A somewhat related thought crops up nearly seven years later, when he writes, "As soon as a truth is longer than five sentences, it becomes a novel. It is a fine thing, a good novel. By no means contemptible, but the unvarnished truth sends one into raptures." Have to let that one digest a bit, I think.

Anyway, to tell the truth, I have no desire to bore you, so I'm not going to engage in any longform lit-crit here, I just wanted to note that this is a very fun book from a time that seems like one of the last fun times for a while in continental European history. As far as "beautiful eras" go, I'm not going to comment on something best viewed and judged both lived in and looked back upon. Instead, let's take it one week at a time and remember we have some hand in the making of the times — good, bad and ugly. Or even beautiful. Ciao for now.

Thursday

I don't know if Canada's Kootenay Mountains have any blue grass growing on their slopes like Kentucky, but there is certainly at least one notable band playing bluegrass music that hails from those parts. Moontricks plays a modern mix of folk, country and the aforementioned stuff to decent crowds and on the festival circuit. Tonight at 7 p.m. at the Arcata Theatre Lounge, you can catch these fellers, paired with Grass Valley and vibes-based EDM artist Equanimous. Call this show a festie's delight ($20, $18 advance, $15 early bird).

Friday

Speaking of Canada, there's another native son from that land coming through the Thing (833 H St.) in Arcata tonight at 7 p.m. Shane Koyczan is a spoken word poet who has done the (near) impossible and cracked open a touring career out of his poetry, built largely on the back of his breakthrough piece "To This Day," which is easy to check out on YouTube. If you aren't too keen on Arts Arcata or Downtown Ball over at Arcata Theatre Lounge, check this guy out ($25, $20 advance).

If you're in the mood for something noisier in the same zip code and lighter on the wallet, head over to the Miniplex by 9 p.m. for a metal show headlined by Portland sludge band Diositopes. Local support will be provided by Boat Cop, Malicious Algorithm and Mystery Meat ($8).

Saturday

Tom Boylan, aka Holus Bolus is rolling through town again, where he will set up his one-man, looped acoustic guitar and percussion show at Redwood Curtain Brewery in Arcata at 6 p.m. for the beer drinkers to enjoy. This is a free gig but it's always nice to tip a traveling bard.

Later on at 8 p.m. at the Arcata Playhouse, you can catch the final night of the Zero to Fierce Fest, with tonight's group Mariachi Lindas Mexicanas, an all-female mariachi band from Los Angeles, providing what I am certain will be a lively and delightful swan song performance after a week of diverse events showcasing the creative powers of women ($20).

Sunday

The Bach On! ensemble throws its final concert of the season at Christ Episcopal Church in Eureka today at 4 p.m. This talented roster of musicians presents a free performance whose program includes Bach's Violin Concerto in A minor and Telemann's Viola Concerto in G major.

Monday

With St. Patrick's Day on Friday and spring coming in a week, I am cautiously optimistic about seeing an end to the frequent dead night or two that the winter brings to the local music scene. Another good sign is that tonight features an installment of Metal Mondays over at Savage Henry at 7 p.m. ($5). This evening's all-ages bash has Planet of Green, Mystery Meat, KMRO and Psyborg. Cool.

Shane Koyczan plays the Thing at 7 p.m. on Friday, March 10.

Tuesday

The Russian piano prodigy Alexander Malofeev comes to Fulkerson Hall for a 6 p.m. recital. Expect nothing short of virtuosity from this kid, who is a world-ranked musician of the finest caliber. I am unsure of what tonight's program will include but I can say with confidence that the pieces will be played with technical brilliance ($49, $15 CPH students).

Wednesday

Andy Frasco & the U.N. are a Los Angeles funk and blues powerhouse whose performances are deliberately chaotic and goofy. Sort of like a mix between Eric André, Dr. Teeth and the Electric Mayhem, and some of the dumb/humorous elements of early Kid Rock that evaporated when reactionary politics replaced his self-awareness. It's a spectacle, folks, with Big Something, a bombastic rock band from Eugene kicking things off. Where? Arcata Theatre Lounge. When? At 7 p.m. And the "how much" is $21. You can fill the rest in for yourself. ●

Collin Yeo (he/him) also has a fond memory of being called a very bad word by a toddler on public transportation, but he isn't about to share that one here. He lives in Arcata.

Creed III

Creed III's Decision Victory

By John J. Bennett
screens@northcoastjournal.com

CREED III. With his directorial debut, Michael B. Jordan has made the subtly momentous decision to render this (presumably last) chapter in the Rocky saga as a statement: This is decidedly not a Rocky movie. Sure, Balboa's shadow flits at the edges of things, he being the somewhat unwitting progenitor of the whole works. And, if we've been following along, it would be hard to argue that Stallone's performance in Creed (2015) doesn't stand among his best (a low bar to some, admittedly). But, as Sly has been quick and public to point out, Jordan, Ryan Coogler and their producing partners had and have a different vision of this franchise than he, the socio-political implications of which we'll delve into another time.

Contextually, though, Rocky v. Apollo has always been a bit of a joke, requiring Renaissance-style forced perspective to render Stallone — even at his most vascular and augmented — anything like a suitable opponent for Carl Weathers' lithe, towering Creed. Especially with the hindsight provided by the three-movie coda that is the Creed franchise, Apollo becomes the more tragic, complex figure of the two, by far. It is even delineated aloud in Creed III that Rocky essentially would not exist if not for the charity of the champ. This becomes, effectively if not surprisingly, our entry point to the themes of this installment.

Adonis (Jordan), having retired as heavy-weight champion of the world and settled permanently in Los Angeles, has refocused his efforts as a gym owner and promoter. With Duke (Wood Harris, a title contender for subtlest oddball in American movies), he's cultivated the talents of at least one champion, meanwhile supporting wife Bianca's (Tessa Thompson) flourishing music career and the raising of their daughter Amara (Mila Davis-Kent, ferocious and adorable). They've got an unassailable family, as well as a mansion, a Rolls-Royce truck and walls full of gold records and championship belts — the dream made transcendent and real.

And then from the suppressed memories of youth emerges Damian Anderson (Jonathan Majors), Donnie's surrogate brother and, before a two-decade fall precipitated by shared trauma, a Golden Gloves amateur with a plan for world domination. At first unassuming and deferential, Dame is nonetheless insistent that he's kept himself in fighting shape, that he's ready for a shot. Adonis, subject to some nebulous guilt and fraternal obligation, is inclined to give it to him, despite Duke's protestations. And so, in a distorted echo of Apollo's anointing of Rocky, old friends become combatants.

If I have one complaint about Creed III — and really, that's about all — it's that Jordan's direction, while undeniably assured and proficient, doesn't fully service the sensitivity and nuance of the screenplay by Keenan Coogler and Zach Baylin (Ryan Coogler gets a story credit). Because woven intricately into the fabric of the story are threads of family as made by genes versus common experience, the effects of trauma, notions of sacrifice, missed opportunity and unsquare-able debt. And while the movie as we have it delivers on many of those themes, it misses greatness by this much.

Among the many attributes on the plus side of the balance sheet stands Majors, unbelievably fit and alternately playing possum and fighting like a wolverine. As soon as he steps into frame, presumably by design but maybe in spite of it, he threatens to devour Jordan. He channels the guile and brutality of a violent child's dream deferred, transmuted into a forging fire of malice and resentment. It becomes entirely plausible that he loves and hates his boyhood best friend in equal measure, and has used 20 years of confinement to refine those feelings and render them a nearly undefeatable battle plan.

While Jordan may not possess the directorial gifts of his collaborator and presumptive mentor Coogler, he has clearly been paying attention to the behind-the-camera workings of the many productions in which he has participated, and his study pays off in solid, decidedly above-average execution of the material. Which is no small feat in itself, much less compounded by the demands of starring in the thing and getting otherworldly jacked in the process.

It is as much the fault of the trajectory of the franchise as anything that Creed III isn't allowed to be more surprising. The job of this picture is to deliver first and second act challenges which, by the calculus of tradition and our expectations, must be resolved to universal satisfaction by movie's end. The vagaries of conventional entertainment — read: return on investment — demand a certain conventionality and that's OK. But there are performances and thematic material here that begin to transcend imposed expectation, and those suggestions of greatness leave me wanting more, even as happy as I am with what we have. Free Will Astrology

Week of March 9, 2023

By Rob Breznsy
freewillastrology@freewillastrology.com

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Repressed feelings and dormant passions are rising to the surface. I bet they will soon be rattling your brain and illuminating your heart, unleashing a soothing turbulence of uncanny glee. Will you get crazy and wise enough to coax the Great Mystery into blessing you with an inspirational revelation or two? I believe you will. I hope you will! The more skillful you are at generating rowdy breakthroughs, the less likely you are to experience a breakdown. Be as unruly as you need to be to liberate the very best healings.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You finally have all you need to finish an incomplete mission or resolve a mess of unsettled karma. The courage and determination you couldn't quite summon before are now fully available as you invoke a climax that will prepare the way for your awe-inspiring rebirth. Gaze into the future, dear Taurus, and scan for radiant beacons that will be your guides in the coming months. You have more help than you know, and now is the time to identify it and move toward it.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Our sun is an average star in a galaxy of 100 billion stars. In comparison to some of its flamboyant compatriots, it's mediocre. Over 860 light years away is a blue-white supergiant star called Rigel, which is twice as hot as our sun and 40,000 times brighter. The red supergiant Antares, over 600 light years away, has 12 times more mass. Yet if those two show-offs had human attitudes, they might be jealous of our star, which is the source of energy for a planet teeming with 8.7 million forms of life. I propose we make the sun your role model for now, Gemini. It's an excellent time to glory in your unique strengths and to exuberantly avoid comparing yourself to anyone else.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): The philosophical principle known as Occam's razor asserts that when trying to understand a problem or enigma, we should favor the simplest explanation with the fewest assumptions. While that's often a useful approach, I don't recommend it in the coming weeks. For you, nuances and subtleties will abound in every situation. Mere simplicity is unlikely to lead to a valid understanding. You will be wise to relish the complications and thrive on the paradoxes. Try to see at least three sides of every story. Further tips: 1. Mysteries may be truer than mere facts. 2. If you're willing to honor your confusion, the full, rich story will eventually emerge.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): "There are no unsacred places," wrote Leo poet Wendell Berry. "There are only sacred places and desecrated places." Poet Allen Ginsberg agreed. "Holy! Holy! Holy! Holy! Holy! Holy!" he wrote. "Holy the solitudes of skyscrapers and pavements! Holy the cafeteria! Holy the mysterious rivers of tears under the streets! Holy the sea, holy the desert, holy the railroad." With Berry's and Ginsberg's prompts as your inspiration, and in accordance with current astrological imperatives, I invite you to invigorate your relationship with sacredness. If nothing is sacred for you, do what it takes to find and commune with sacred things, places, animals, humans, and phenomena. If you are already a lover of sacred wonders, give them extra love and care. To expand your thinking and tenderize your mood, give your adoration to these related themes: consecration, sublimity, veneration, devotion, reverence, awe, and splendor.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): My favorite Buddhist monk, Thich Nhat Hanh, wrote the following: "In us, there is a river of feelings, in which every drop of water is a different feeling, and each feeling relies on all the others for its existence. To observe it, we just sit on the bank of the river and identify each feeling as it surfaces, flows by, and disappears." I bring this meditation to your attention, Virgo, because I hope you will do it daily during the next two weeks. Now is an excellent time to cultivate an intense awareness of your feelings—to exult in their rich meanings, to value their spiritual power, to feel gratitude for educating and entertaining you.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): How might your life come into clearer focus when you uncover secrets that inspire your initiative and ingenuity? What happens when resources that had been inaccessible become available for your enjoyment and use? How will you respond if neglected truths spring into view and point the way toward improvements in your job situation? I suspect you will soon be able to tell me stories about all this good stuff. PS: Don't waste time feeling doubtful about whether the magic is real. Just welcome it and make it work for you!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): It's not the best time to tattoo a lover's likeness on your abdomen. Maybe in May, but not now. On the other hand, the coming weeks will be an excellent time to see if your paramour might be willing to tattoo your name on their thigh. Similarly, this is a favorable period to investigate which of your allies would wake up at 5 am to drive you to the airport, and which of your acquaintances and friends would stop others from spreading malicious gossip about you, and which authorities would reward you if you spoke up with constructive critiques.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Redwoods are the tallest trees in the world. They may grow as high as 350 feet. Their roots are shallow, though, reaching down just six to 12 feet before spreading out 60 to 100 feet horizontally. And yet the trees are sturdy, rarely susceptible to being toppled by high winds and floods. What's their secret? Their root systems are interwoven with those of other nearby redwoods. Together, they form networks of allies, supporting each other and literally sharing nutrients. I endorse this model for you to emulate in your efforts to create additional stability and security in your life, Sagittarius.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): What's the best way to be fulfilled? Hard work and discipline? Are we most likely to flourish if we indulge only moderately in life's sweet pleasures and mostly focus on the difficult tasks that build our skills and clout? Or is it more accurate to say that 90 percent of success is just showing up: being patient and persistent as we carry out the small day-to-day sacrifices and devotions that incrementally make us indispensable? Mythologist Joseph Campbell described a third variation: to "follow our bliss." We find out what activities give us the greatest joy and install those activities at the center of our lives. As a Capricorn, you are naturally skilled at the first two approaches. In the coming months, I encourage you to increase your proficiency at the third.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Mackerels are unusual fish in that they must keep swimming nonstop. If they don't, they die. Do they ever sleep? Scientists haven't found any evidence that they do. I bring them up now because many of you Aquarians have resemblances to mackerels—and I think it's especially crucial that you not act like them in the coming weeks. I promise you that nothing bad will happen if you slow way down and indulge in prolonged periods of relaxing stillness. Just the opposite in fact: Your mental and physical health will thrive as you give your internal batteries time and space to recharge.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A financial advisor once told me I could adopt one of three approaches to running my business: 1. Ignore change; 2. always struggle with change, half-immobilized by mixed feelings about whether to change or stay put; 3. learn to love and thrive on change. The advisor said that if I chose either of the first two options, I would always be forced to change by circumstances beyond my control. The third approach is ultimately the only one that works. Now is an excellent time for you Pisceans to commit yourself fully to number three—for both your business and your life. ●

You should also be aware that the lien being auctioned off may be a junior lien. If you are the highest bidder at the auction, you are or may be responsible for paying off all liens senior to the lien being auctioned off, before you can receive clear title to the property. You are encouraged to investigate the existence, priority, and size of outstanding liens that may exist on this property by contacting the county recorder's office or a title insurance company, either of which may charge you a fee for this information. "NOTICE TO POTENTIAL BIDDERS: If you are considering bidding on this property lien, you should understand that there are risks involved in bidding at a trustee auction. You will be bidding on a lien, not on the property itself. Placing the highest bid on a trustee auction does not automatically entitle you to free and clear ownership of the property. You should also be aware that the lien being auctioned off may be a junior lien. If you are the highest bidder at the auction, you are or may be responsible for paying off all liens senior to the lien being auctioned off, before you can receive clear title to the property. You are encouraged to investigate the existence, priority, and size of the outstanding lien that may exist on this property by contacting the county recorder's office or a title insurance company, either of which may charge you a fee for this information. If you consult either of these resources, you should be aware that the same lender may hold more than one mortgage or deed of trust on the property. NOTICE TO PROPERTY OWNER: The sale date shown in this notice of sale may be postponed one or more times by the mortgagee, beneficiary, trustee, or a court, pursuant to Section 2924g of the California Civil Code. The law requires that information about trustee sale postponements be made available to you and to the public, as a courtesy to those not present at the sale. If you wish to learn whether your sale date has been postponed, and if applicable, the rescheduled time and date for the sale of this property, you may call 844-477-7869, or visit this internet Web site www.stoxposting.com, using the file number assigned to this case T.S.# 86125. Information about postponements that are very short in duration or that occur close in time to the scheduled sale may not immediately be reflected in the telephone information or on the Internet Web site. The best way to verify postponement information is to attend the scheduled sale." For sales conducted after January 1, 2021: NOTICE TO TENANT: You may have a right to purchase this property after the trustee auction pursuant to Section 2924m of the California Civil Code. If you are an "eligible tenant buyer," you can purchase the property if you match the last and highest bid placed at the trustee auction. If you are an "eligible bidder," you may be able to purchase the property if you exceed the last and highest bid placed at the trustee auction. There are three steps to exercising this right of purchase. First, 48 hours after the date of the trustee sale, you can call (844) 477-7869, or visit this internet website www.STOXPOSTING.com, using the file number assigned to this case 86125 to find the date on which the trustee's sale was held, the amount of the last and highest bid, and the address of the trustee. Second, you must send a written notice of intent to place a bid so that the trustee receives it no more than 15 days after the trustee's sale. Third, you must submit a bid; by remitting the funds and affidavit described in Section 2924m(c) of the Civil Code; so that the trustee receives it no more than 45 days after the trustee's sale. If you think you may qualify as an "eligible tenant buyer" or "eligible bidder," you should consider contacting an attorney or appropriate real estate professional immediately for advice regarding this potential right to purchase.
